

A組(非應外系所學生)講稿

1)The Power of a Small Act

One day after school, a boy noticed an elderly man struggling to carry heavy bags across the street. Without thinking twice, the boy walked up and said, "Sir, may I help you?"

The old man looked surprised, then smiled and nodded. "Thank you, young man," he said, his voice shaking slightly.

As they walked together, the man shared a few stories from his youth. The boy listened politely, even though he was tired.

At the end of the walk, the man said, "You remind me of my grandson. He's far away now. I haven't spoken to anyone kindly in days. Thank you for your time."

The boy smiled and walked home, feeling a little lighter. He didn't think he had done anything special.

But the next day, something changed. His classmates, who usually ignored him, smiled at him. "I saw what you did yesterday," one said. "That was cool."

And just like that—a small act of kindness became a spark.

We often believe we need to do big things to matter. But small things—like a smile, a kind word, or lending a hand—can start a quiet chain reaction.

Never underestimate the power of kindness.

It may seem small to you, but to someone else... it might mean the world.

2) A Letter to My Future Self

Dear Future Me,

Are you still chasing your dreams? Are you happy with the life you've built?
Do you still remember this version of us—young, unsure, but full of hope?

Right now, I'm trying my best. Some days, I feel confident and excited. Other days, I feel tired and confused. But even on hard days, I keep going.

I study late at night. I take risks. I sometimes fail. But I've learned that failure is not the end—it's part of the journey.

I hope you've become someone who's kind, not only to others but to yourself. I hope you still laugh loudly, cry freely, and speak honestly.

Please don't forget how far we've come.
Don't forget the teachers who believed in us.
Don't forget the quiet nights filled with dreams.

And don't forget me—the younger you—who never gave up, even when things got hard.

You are who you are today... because of everything we've faced together.

With love,
Your Past Self

3) Why We Travel

People travel for many reasons. Some want to see famous landmarks. Others want to taste new food, hear different languages, or simply escape from daily life.

But sometimes, the most important reason we travel... is to discover something new about ourselves.

When we're in a new place, everything feels fresh. We notice how people live differently. How they greet each other. How they eat, dress, and even walk.

We realize that what's "normal" for us isn't the same everywhere—and that's beautiful.

We start to appreciate things we once ignored. We learn to be patient when things don't go as planned. We find joy in small moments: a local smile, a quiet sunset, a shared laugh with a stranger.

Traveling shows us that the world is vast, diverse, and full of stories.

And it teaches us humility—that we are just one of many voices, many dreams.

So wherever you go, go with an open heart.

Try the unfamiliar. Ask questions. Make mistakes.

Because when we explore the world, we often discover something even more meaningful:

Who we truly are.